Selected info Update This article is no longer maintained. Please use the official website at The Climate Commission The Climate Commission is the authoritative, independent, international body responsible for Australian climate science. The Climate Commission's role is to provide advice to governments, industry and the public, so they can make the best decisions to minimise the impact of climate change. The Commission does not change, judge or censor climate science. The Commission is made up of five Commissioners who are nominated by their countries' governments and are appointed by the Council of the Commonwealth. Commissioners can only be from the Commonwealth, and have a relevant background in climate science. Climate Commissioner In Australia, the Climate Commissioner is an appointed officer of the Crown. The Climate Commissioner holds office in the Australian Public Service. The Climate Commissioner is responsible to the Australian Government for the Climate Commission and reports to the Minister for Climate Change. The Climate Commissioner has no executive powers. How the Commission reports The Commission reports on climate science and information about climate change. Some key facts about climate change and the Commission's work on Australia's climate are shown below: The Commission processes information and analyses produced by a range of experts and the public, and provides advice to the Australian Government and to the community. Because climate change is a long-term, global problem, the Commission collects and analyzes relevant information globally. Commissioners and secretariat The Commission is a not-for-profit organisation, which relies on donations from the Australian public and private sector. The Secretariat manages the day-to-day administration of the Commission, including reporting on the activities and products of the Commission. The Secretariat works closely with the other statutory offices of the Commonwealth and the Department of the Environment and Energy
